Foreword to Revised Edition

The editors of the FOLKLORE FORUM are very glad to make available this special edition of The Types of the Polack Joke (Revised Edition).

No. 3 (November 1969) of the Bibliographic and Special Series of the FOLKLORE FORUM was entitled "The Types of the Polack Joke." It was an excellent indexing of Polack jokes, and the value of it was quickly apparent as it went out of print shortly after publication. Compiler William M. Clements later published more on the joke ("The Polack Jokes in 1970: An Addendum," Folklore Forum IV: 1-2 [January - March 1971]: 19-29) in which he added a number of new items to the index.

It was decided by the editors that a special edition should be made available containing the material found in both of Mr. Clements's compilations. This present edition is a product of that decision. The original form and material was retained, and the material from the later article was incorporated into this revised edition. Other than this incorporation, this edition contains no substantive changes from the first edition.

Some attempt was made to remove typographical errors which appeared in the earlier publications, but we are certain that somewhere in this new printing, errors have crept in. However, the usually scrupulous proofing of all FOLKLORE FORUM issues is always thwarted by the best of intentions.

INTRODUCTION

The Polack joke, the American humorous genre William Clements attempts to classify here, presents intriguing problems for the indexer. Although the form has been called a type of riddle by Donald Simmons, popular usage insists it is a type of joke and probably few folklorists would care to argue otherwise. Usually it happens to be manifest in question and answer form, but an attempt to guess the answer is never really part of the folkloric process involved. The answer is not part of a gest of wit; it is, in essence, a punchline. The genre (or sub-genre, if you will) shows obvious affinities to tales and anecdotes about numskulls and in a few cases correspondences to the Aarne-Thompson (AT) and Baughman numbering systems for folk narrative have been noted. The form also shows obvious affinities to the blason populaire and other traditional "racial" slurs. It is probably accurate to assert, however, that little or no malice against Poles (or Italians or Kentuckians) is intended. Although we are aware of no study of the attitudes of the tellers of Polack jokes, it seems fair to say that the Polack (or Newfie or Brier) is not a specifically racial stereotype, as is, say, Rastus. That is, the Polack is more a numskull stereotype, related to but essentially distinct from whatever ethnic stereotype the Polish-American may have in the eyes of his countrymen. He is rather like the foolish Gothamite, with the added characteristics of incredible grossness; just as few Englishmen would suggest that the real-life residents of Gotham are fools, so probably few Americans would suggest that Poles are really as they are depicted in jokes.

Mr. Clements has, like other classifiers before him, found it necessary to create a new system of classification, based on and related to existing systems, but essentially quite distinct. This was necessitated by several factors, not the least of which was the very uniqueness of the genre dealt with. It appears in question and answer form, but clearly no system of riddle classification fits it. It seems most closely related to certain types of jokes and anecdotes, yet it is not a narrative form and cannot be worked into any of the existing narrative indexes. The jokes and anecdotes section of the Aarne-Thompson index has generally been considered the weakest part of that great work and probably any index of humorous forms will have to be constructed largely outside the scope of AT. Of course, Reidar Th. Christiansen realized the necessity of going beyond AT for narratives of a sort quite different from the folktales Aarne and Thompson analyzed in his own Migratory Legends. Christiansen used principles similar to those of Aarne and Thompson and, in a sense, extended their numbering system by starting at 3000. Jan Harold Brunvand's classification of shaggy dog stories is no doubt the index most similar to Clements's. Brunvand based his system to a certain extent on Thompson's Motif-Index, using letters to indicate broad categories and numbers for individual types. Brunvand's letter categories are fewer and more broadly conceived, however, and his more detailed classification is worked out numerically. Interest in jokelore among folklorists has been growing in recent years and Brunvand's index was a major effort to impose some order on one genre of American humor. Clements's index is another step toward ordering American jokelore and should prove to be of great utility in the future.

THE TYPES OF THE POLACK JOKE

When Rowan and Martin's Laugh-In began to present jokes about the Polish immigrant during the spring of 1968, the Polack joke became officially entrenched in popular culture. These materials, however, had existed in oral tradition and in ephemeral printed joke books long before television discovered them. Of course, it is virtually impossible to assign a specific birth date to the Polack joke; but the 1960's witnessed its development in various manifestations. Many of the jokes told about Polacks have, in fact, been collected for twenty years or more.

What is a Polack joke? A Polack may be defined as a person of Polish ancestry who lives with others of his kind usually in an American urban environment. He is characterized as large in size, strong, gross in appetite, stupid, dirty, excessive in sexual activities, cowardly, and avaricious. He is known by such aliases as Kentuckian (Brier, Hillbilly) in Indiana and Ohio, Buckeye or Hoosier in Kentucky, Cajun in Louisiana, Aggie in Texas, Okie in California, Newfie in Canada, and Negro everywhere. Polack jokes may also be told about Irishmen, Little Morons, Jews, Italians, Puerto Ricans, and Texans (is no one sacred?). Polack jokes are usually short and succinct, often consisting of only a question and answer. The humor may hinge on word play or on some characteristic generally recognized as attributable to Polacks.

Who tells Polack jokes? Sources in the Indiana University Folklore Archives indicate that WASP truck drivers, Polish housewives, Italian grocery store managers, voluptuous college coeds, Irish policemen, Hungarian factory workers, Greek vice presidents, and old maid librarians all tell Polack jokes. In fact, even the Green Bay Packers tell Polack jokes -- only about Belgians:

"OK; boys," Coach said, in a calm voice. "I want to tell you a little story." He paused, and we waited, very quietly, to hear what he had to say. "Did you ever hear," Vince said, "about why Belgians are so strong?"

In Green Bay, we tell Belgian jokes, the same jokes people in some areas tell about Italians and people in other areas tell about Poles.

"No," one of the guys said.

"'Cause they raise dumbbells," said Lombardi.

That was his whole pregame speech. It was a silly, asinine little joke, but it worked. It took the edge off the tension. Most of the guys giggled, and we all loosened up. We went out and beat the Bears 17-13. (Instant Replay, The Green Bay Diary of Jerry Kramer, ed. Dick Schaap, The New American Library, 1969, p. 173)

Not enough is known about which jokes come from Polish communities and which come from the outside world to be able to comment intelligently on the esoteric and exoteric factors in this humor. It can be said generally that the jokes do circulate among Polish-Americans as well as among others, but the degree and extent of this circulation has not been ascertained.
The purpose of this index, however, is not to suggest anything about the psychology of the surveyors of Polack jokes. Nor has there been any attempt to connect these materials with other folklore items in a particular informant's or folk group's repertoire. The index is an attempt to arrange, as logically as possible, the collection of Polack jokes deposited in the Indiana University Folklore Archives by students taking introductory folklore courses at several Indiana University campuses.

With material collected as long ago as the 1930's, the Indiana University Folklore Archives is one of the largest depositories of items of folklore in manuscript form in the United States. The Archives, a part of Indiana University's Folklore Institute, consists of three distinct divisions in which much lore, especially that of college students, may be found. The oldest division, the WPA Collection compiled by participants in the Federal Writers' Project of the Works Projects Administration during the 1930's, contains no material relevant to Polack jokes. The bulk of the WPA Collection consists of many pages of reminiscences and sentimental sketches. Much valuable information, especially relating to folklife, is buried in this potpourri of material.*

The second major division of the Indiana University Folklore Archives is the MSU Collection, an assemblage of materials submitted by students of Professor Richard M. Dorson in folklore courses he taught while a member of the history department of Michigan State University. The lore in the MSU Collection has been separated according to genre, cultural area, and ethnic group. Recently a new index to this collection has been prepared, and the researcher can locate materials readily.

The IU Collection contains the largest amount of material in the Archives and is the only one of the three divisions that still receives lore. The major part of the IU Collection consists of items of folklore submitted by students as part of the term assignment in beginning folklore courses taught by the staff of the Folklore Institute on several of Indiana University's campuses. Prior to 1967, these student collections were separated in the same manner as the material in the MSU Collection (i.e., according to genre, culture area, and ethnic group). Since 1967, however, the collections have been filed in individual folders with index cards giving cross references. Collector cards, category cards, and cultural-geographic cards enable the researcher to locate materials in three ways. The Polack jokes in this index have been taken from the IU Collection. Analogues from the MSU Collection, referring to people or groups besides Polacks, have been noted.

The index, of course, is not an exhaustive collection of Polack jokes. Since the genre is vital, new jokes are continually appearing, and old jokes take on new hues when told about Polacks. Printed sources have not received complete coverage, for many joke books are so ephemeral that they are almost impossible to consult. This is an index, however, of all Polack jokes which had been deposited in the Indiana University Folklore Archives by the end of 1969 with the addition of a few items from personal recollection.

Key to the Index

References to the MSU Collection are always made first; this is followed by a citation from the IU Collection; the final entry lists printed sources in which analogous materials have been found. Jokes which have not been deposited in the Indiana University Folklore Archives and which come from personal recollection or elsewhere are marked by an asterisk (*). Baughman and AT numbers have been noted where applicable.

MSU:

3x5(00) indicates that the joke has been found in the collection of jokes filed on 3x5 cards in the MSU Collection. In parentheses the sequential number of the joke is submitted. Several parenthetical numbers indicate that several texts of the joke are present in the collection.

JHO.0(00) indicates that the joke has been found among the collection of jokes filed on 8x11 sheets in the MSU Collection. "JH" designates the "Jokes and Humor" section of the new index. The decimal number which follows signifies the folder in this section in which the specific item appears. The number in parentheses indicates the number of texts of a particular joke that may be found in the collection.

IU:

JI-00(00) indicates that the joke has been found in the collection of jokes filed on 3x5 cards (old file) in the IU Collection. The second part of the designation signifies the subject heading under which a particular joke is filed. In parentheses the sequential number of the joke is submitted. Several parenthetical numbers indicate that several texts of the joke are present in the collection.

JII-00(00) indicates that the joke has been found in the collection of jokes filed on 3x5 cards (new file) in the IU Collection. The second part of the designation signifies the subject heading under which a particular joke is filed. In parentheses the sequential number of the joke is submitted. Several parenthetical numbers indicate that several texts of the joke are present in the collection.

Race Jokes indicates that the joke may be found in the folder or Moron title in the IU Collection. The number in parentheses indicates the number of texts of a particular joke present in the collection.

67/00, 68/00, or 69/00 indicates that the joke may be found in the particular student collection bearing that number. The digits to the left of the slash indicate the year in which the collection was archived. The digits to the right indicate the sequence in which the collection was archived.

Printed Sources:

Despite the reported attempts by such organizations as the Polish Veterans' Association and the Polish Paratroopers' Association (see Folklore Forum, III, 2, p. 71) to curb their circulation, the year 1970 produced a number of Polack jokes which had not appeared in the files of the Indiana University Folklore Archives earlier. Collections submitted by undergraduate students in folklore courses at the Bloomington, Fort Wayne, and Kokomo campuses of Indiana University yielded these new jokes, many of which had already been reported about minority groups other than Polish-Americans. In addition, many of the Polack jokes previously indexed cropped up again and testified to the continuing vitality of this genre (or subgenre).

The following is a supplement to The Types of the Polack Joke (Folklore Forum, Bibliographic and Special Series No. 3) and arranges the "new" jokes according to the system used there. Once again, no attempt has been made to go beyond the classification of the texts. When similar jokes told about other groups have been located in the Archives, mention is made. Where relevant, numbers from Baughman's Type and Motif Index of the Folktales of England and North America are cited.

Since the appearance of the original index, additional information on the distribution and diverse applicability of what Brunvand calls "ethnic-regional riddle jokes" (Indiana Folklore, III, 1, pp. 128-142) has been encountered. In his dissertation, "Ukrainian Folklore in Canada: An Immigrant Complex in Transition" (Indiana University, 1971), Robert B. Klymasz reports jokes of the Polack type told about Ukrainians in Canada. Recent Archives acquisitions demonstrate that the jokes may be directed at hippies and, with some poetic justice, at Spiro Agnew.

The point, then, is that the "ethnic-regional riddle joke" tradition is far from moribund. This is proven by the more than fifty joke types indexed below, the recurrence of joke types previously classified, and the additional groups and individuals at which these jokes are reported to be directed.

Key to the Index

After each joke in the following index the location of the text in the Indiana University Folklore Archives is given. These accession codes are those used in The Types of the Polack Joke with the following additions:

Jokes: ethnic: 70:00 or
Jokes: ethnic: Polack: 70:00 or
Jokes: obscene: 70:00 -- Since some instructors require undergraduate students to submit weekly, rather than term, projects which often require the collection of only one item with extensive information about context and function, those projects which deal with a particular genre of folklore can be grouped together in a single folder. Each item within one of these folders, which are designated by the genre contained within, is assigned a number consisting of the date when received by the Archives and the sequence in which the item was filed. The "70" indicates the year of acquisition, and the digits to the right of the colon indicate the sequence of accession.
